Poem 1: "Silent Echoes"

THE FIVE SPOT

There's always a lesson to be learned, whether in a hotel bar or over tea in a teahouse, no matter which way it goes, for you or against,
what you want to hear or what you don't.

Seeing Roland Kirk, for example, with two then three saxophones in his mouth at once and a kazoo, no less, hanging from his neck at the ready.

Even in my youth I saw this not as a lesson in keeping busy with one thing or another, but as a joyous impossible lesson in how to do it all at once, pleasing and displeasing yourself with harmony here and discord there.

But what else did I know as the waitress lit the candle on my round table in the dark?
What did I know about anything?
